When two extension buildings were added to Utah's Capitol Hill, the natural stone cladding had to match the stone on the existing building (circa 1915). Gris Alcazars granite was selected, with Campolonghi Italia SRL instructing its staff to leave in black inclusions that made the material more closely match the existing stone.

Other challenges were to match the finishes of the original structure and incorporate intricate and historically consistent stone detailing using modern construction technology in creating pilasters, columns, and balustrades. Each circular column contains 30 pieces of handset stone.
